Attack on the Paw Paw Fort

Missouri's CIVIL WAR

Northwest Missouri Frontier

Northwest Missouri was a hotbed of pro-secessionist sentiment during the Civil War. The region was largely populated by immigrants from the South and West, many of whom were sympathetic to the Confederate cause. The area was a key strategic location for the Confederacy, as it provided a vital supply line for the war effort.

In the summer of 1861, Union forces moved into Northwest Missouri to suppress the secessionist sentiment. The Union army was met with resistance from the local population, who were sympathetic to the Confederate cause. The Union army was forced to retreat through the area, and the Confederates were able to reestablish their control over the region.

The fort was built in 1861 and was a key strategic location for the Confederacy. It was a well-fortified structure that provided a safe haven for the Confederate forces in the region. The fort was eventually captured by Union forces in 1862, and the Confederates were forced to abandon the area.
