Plans Change

The Confederates advanced slowly, stopping for meals and gathering supplies. On September 27, they arrived at Ft. Davidson, south of St. Louis, unopposed. They were engaged, and, after dark, the outnumbered Union garrison slipped from the fort. Some Southern troops gave chase. Before the Confederates could regroup, St. Louis was alerted. The necessary "moment of surprise" was lost, and also the major objective of the raid.

Raiders Turn West

General Price's men turned toward Jefferson City, the state capital. Enroute, they recruited men, and swept the area of mules, horses, cattle and military supplies. But, at Jefferson City, unexpected Union strength discouraged attack. The army rode on westward, through the river towns, on toward Kansas City and Ft. Leavenworth.

DEFIANT SWEEP ACROSS MISSOURI

A Trap Awaits

Meanwhile, two large Union forces were in pursuit from St. Louis: General Alfred Pleasonton's cavalry behind them and General Andrew Smith's infantry to the south. The deep, bridgeless Missouri River was north and General Samuel Curtis' U.S. Army of the Border was ahead.
